(Intercultural Development Inventory), which is one of the only internationally recognized tools to assess intercultural competence. Students will receive an individualized plan of study to work on throughout the course so as to increase intercultural competence. Thus, GLST 280 provides a foundational, holistic approach to intercultural competence, whereas SPCM 470 looks at a specialized aspect of the field.

Given that the majors in French Studies, German, and Spanish enter the major at vastly different points (anywhere from 101 to 310), it is difficult to provide a language-specific orientation experience (like a first-year seminar). Furthermore, global studies majors also have a significant language component (21 credits), but they do not all take the same language. This, too, complicates any shared orientation or seminar course. However, this newly proposed course (GLST 280) covers one of the primary goals of language and culture studies: intercultural competence. This course will eventually serve as an orientation course for all of the majors in the Department of Modern Languages and Global Studies, as well as the Workplace Intercultural Competence certificate. As the course is taught in English and looks at cultures from around the globe, students across all of our programs will be able to take the course together and learn within a multicultural and multilinguistic shared community. Currently, there is not a course at the general education level (100- and 200-level courses) that meets this need. This course will be the entry-level complement to the recently developed and shared capstone course.
