

First-Generation college students are defined as someone whose parent(s)/guardians did not complete a 4-year degree OR completed a degree at a foreign university. Being first-generation is important to note as parents may not understand the nuances of higher education, thus leaving the students at a disadvantage.

33% of students are considered first-generation <ul style="list-style-type: none">o 59% of first-generation students are also the first sibling in their family to attend college After six years of first entering postsecondary education, 56% of first-generation college students have not earned any postsecondary credential. In their first year in postsecondary education, a higher percentage of first-generation students used financial aid services, but lower percentages used health, academic advising, and academic support services.	First-generation students are breaking down barriers and paving new paths for themselves. Being first-generation is a motivator for many students. Going to college means learning to walk between worlds, and for some, never quite fitting in to either. Support from institutions and faculty members can have a real and positive impact on first-generation students. First-generation students have identified mentorship as a key component of successful student services.
---	--

